the GREAT Lion Brain Tease

DISAPPEARING JOBS. ARE WE UP FOR IT?

Over the last 150 years, best practice life expectancy is that for every 10 years you live, your life expectancy is growing by two years. For someone born in the late 1990s who chooses to work for 40 years, will have to fund 35 years once they stop earning. The fact is that we are living a lot longer.

However, as much as our life expectancy is increasing, the pace of technological change has also been speedy and erratic. The developments in artificial intelligence and robotics are leading to a decreasing number of the workforce, especially the middle skilled jobs. It is suggested that jobs that involve skilled trade, dental and medical, social/health/children and education will stand the test of time in the career world.

Pushing back the retirement age will not resolve the issue of increasing life expectancy, but a multi-phase career pattern will surface, which we will see employees take breaks as they refresh and re-skill in order to keep up with technology. For organisations, their approach will focus more on customising individuals' career development, people management and performance management rather than as a group as the current and future workforce is multi-generational.

Here are 3 ways to ensure a success in implementing the multiphase career pattern:

1. Devise Your Career: The 3 Rs

For employees, be prepared to Relearn, Re-Skill and Re-Invent your career path regularly are the 3 Rs to excel in a multi-phase career. Also, be alert to trends as skills and jobs become more or less important in response to continuously emerging technologies as well as taking personal control and responsibility for your career development.

2. Organisations Must React

Organisations will react as working patterns change. Organisations are experimenting with flexibility working concept to feed the employees' demand. This flexibility working concept will allow employees who would want to join the organisation at different career stages, but they also will demand more time off to learn, to study or to go on sabbaticals as well as to take some time off to do something of significance.

3. An Original Type of Leader

The leaders who know how the future is and has an authentic understanding of what the future workplace holds as opposed to leaders who direct what must be done, will be the leader in this new individualised working environment.

The good news is all of these things are not unattainable. Most organisations place emphasis on continuous learning as it directly benefits them to have a skilled pool of workers. So take some time to scout around for programs which you feel will complement your skill set, and approach your HR team with those registration forms!
